"When we talk about that which will sustain and nurture our spiritual growth as a people, we must once again talk about the importance of community. For one of the most vital ways that we sustain ourselves is by building communities of resistance, places where we know we are not alone." ~bell hooks Teaching to Transgress: Education as the Practice of Freedom

Dear E.L. Haynes Families,

One of the cornerstones of the E.L. Haynes community is our diversity. As a community, we have the opportunity daily to interact with students and families from across the District of Columbia; we speak different languages, have different family structures, have a wide variety of interests and talents, love different music and foods, are interested in a variety of opportunities to learn, and more. We come together with rich family histories and cultural backgrounds from around the world.

This past week several of our staff had the opportunity to focus on one aspect of our diversity—race. Our three day journey was the first of what will become an ongoing part of our conversation as a school community—involving staff, families, and students alike. The work of the National School Reform Faculty along with the Center for Equitable and Effective Leadership informed the staff's work together.

Our focus on race is a simple and very important one: race is an undeniable factor in education and continues to play a factor in the gap between white and Asian students and their Black, Latino, Native American, Southeast Asian, and Pacific Islander counterparts across the United States and many parts of the world. Without question, poverty and wealth impact student achievement as well. Statistically, however, even within the same economic strata, there is an achievement gap based on race.

The only way we will be truly able to reach our mission as a school is to embrace this work as an entire community—bridging gaps across difference, reaching out to learn more about one another, helping one another in the education of all of our students, and continuing to grow. Building our alliances across difference will make us strong and break the cycle of inequitable practices so prevalent in our nation's schools. We must do this work and our vision and mission state this need clearly. (See Announcements.) Thanks for being a part of our community's work—the fulfillment of our mission for all students. Join us at:

- ❖ SPT (School Parent Team) Meeting: Tuesday, June 1 from 6:15-7:30 PM
- ❖ Coffee Talk About Race: Wednesday, June 9 from 8:30-9:30 AM

Sincerely,

Michelle M. Molitor

Building Our Alliances Across Difference: Here are additional resources and inspiring quotes that guided the work of the staff retreat last week described in the Haynes Herald.

Educational Equity is raising the achievement of all students while

- ❖ narrowing the gaps between the highest- and lowest- performing students; and
- ❖ eliminating the racial predictability and dis-proportionality of which student groups occupy the highest and lowest achievement categories.

“Equity is not a guarantee that all students will succeed. Rather, it assures that all students will have the opportunity and support to succeed. In an equitable system, the barriers that inhibit student progress are removed. Students of color and their families can rest assured that the school will meet their needs to the same degree it meets White students’ needs. Equity does not mean that every student receives an equal level of resources and support towards his or her educational goals. Rather, equity means that the students of greatest need receive the greatest level of support to guarantee academic success.” From Courageous Conversations About Race. Glenn Singleton and Curtis Linton.

Piano Lessons Anyone?: A Columbia Heights piano enthusiast, Rich Levy, is looking to give back to the local community by giving free piano lessons to interested students at ECAC starting the fall 2010. He can most likely accommodate several students for individual half hour lessons, or in some other format if there is need or interest. Students age 12 and over are welcome. No experience is necessary, but an interested student should have access to a piano for practice.

For more information please contact Rich at 202.309.2583.

Saturday, May 29th from 2:00 – 5:00pm: We Are the Ones! Oratory Contest for Teenage Girls

The Contest, sponsored by the African American Women's Resource Center, is being held in honor of Septima Clark, an educator, civil rights activist and considered by some as the "grandmother" of the civil rights movement. Septima Clark was born in Charleston, South Carolina in 1898. She was a renowned orator and employed others to always bring along two generations -- always asking those she came into contact with "who are you bringing along." Thirty seven girls have applied for the Contest. Your presence will add encouragement to these courageous young women. More information: Cassandra Burton at 202-332-6561 or cassandraburton@aawrc.org. Refreshments will be provided.

Cost: Free

Counselor's Corner

We live in a society where race matters. As a school community we are committed to focusing on our journey to address anti-racism and inequity to promote a caring community where all children can develop as learners. We encourage our parent to discuss issues of race with their children to further develop their social emotional development and contribute to our ability to nurture a caring and diverse school community. In our school community, we encourage children to have courageous conversations about race to promote and sustain positive social connections along differences .

Talking to Kids About Race By Nadra Kareem, About.com Guide

Say your kindergartener comes home with a question: "Why are some people called black and others white?" How will you answer? Next to the sex talk, talking to kids about race is perhaps the hardest conversation for a parent. Sure, America elected a black president, but we still live in a world that's far from color-blind. While it's natural to want to shield your child from life's harsh realities, staying silent about race isn't OK. Discussing the subject openly allows children to build bridges and respect others. Not openly having a dialogue with our children about race makes them unprepared to engage in a diverse global world .

The same way we remind our children that "Mommies can be doctors like daddies" we should be reminding all children that doctors come in all colors. As parent we often shush our children when they make a remark about a child's race but shushing them sends the message that this topic is unspeakable which makes race more loaded and intimidating ... (excerpt taken from Nurture Shock , Po Bronson and Ashley Merryman)

When's the Right Age to Talk Race?

Think your children are too young for the "race talk?" In fact, children as young as 3 can spot differences between racial groups. A few years after that, they start to make judgments about people from different races. What does this mean? Whether you talk to your kids about race or not, they'll form opinions about it anyway. If they make a remark that stumps you, investigate until you form a coherent response. You might just learn something in the process.

Go to a Cultural Event

How much do your kids know about people from different cultures? Whether they're totally clueless or ambassadors-in-the-making, they'll have loads of fun at cultural celebrations. With the food, music and learning that take place at these events, what's not to love? The great thing is that cultural events take place all year.

Enjoy a Chinese New Year celebration in January, a Black History Month event in February, a St. Patrick's Day parade in March or a Cinco de Mayo bash in May. During these outings, your children won't only have the chance to learn about the history and cultural significance of different events, they'll also get to mingle with folks from all sorts of backgrounds. This gives a real boost to kids who live in places where they're racial anomalies, like trans racial adoptees with a better chance of meeting a celebrity than someone from their birth country. Want tips on how to talk race with children you've adopted cross culturally? Check out the Fusion program, which offers suggestions to parents just like you.

Take a Trip to a Cultural Museum

Slavery. The Holocaust. Japanese American Internment. How do you bring up racial oppression with children? A trip to a cultural museum is a great starting point. Throughout the country, you can find museums with a social justice bent. Drop by the Museum of Tolerance and the Japanese American National Museum in Los Angeles. There's also the DuSable Museum of African American History and the Birmingham Civil Rights Institute in Chicago and Alabama, respectively.

Get Out of Town

Don't have a museum like this in your area? Forget about Disneyland and the Grand Canyon. Make a visit to a cultural museum the focus of your next family getaway. If it's hard for the entire family to leave town, sign your teen up for a camp hosted by the National Conference of Community and Justice (NCCJ). There, your kid will learn about race and bias with the people they respect most—their peers!
